

GENDER NOTE 1: RESPONSE

Members of the Gender and Disaster Network
January 2005

By all accounts, women and children were very hard-hit in the tsunami:

- Women and girls typically not taught to swim
- Mothers sought to save children
- Physical factors: pregnancy, strength, clothing

Girls and women are at high risk in the immediate aftermath:

- Reproductive health needs (pregnancy, childbirth)
- Cultural devaluation of girls in some regions
- Sex segregation norms can preclude publicly seeking help
- Disproportionately high rates of poverty, malnutrition, illiteracy
- Social exclusion of women on their own (e.g. widows, household heads)
- Earning opportunities lost, economic needs increased
- Male needs and interests tend to be asserted and visible

In the immediate aftermath, women and girls need:

- Representation in decision-making about relief— now
- Participation in all community consultations, especially about emergency shelter and temporary encampments
- Culturally appropriate clothing
- Sanitary supplies and privacy
- Support for pregnant women and new mothers including food supplements
- Culturally appropriate opportunities for worship
- Security against sexual assault and extortion (sex for food)
- Protection from trafficking (girls/boys)
- Income support, targeted economic recovery programs
- Support as caregivers with expanded responsibilities

Gender patterns neglected now produce gender inequalities later:

- Work through existing women's and community groups
- Recruit local women for assessments and other response work
- Recruit women staff and volunteers to reach local women
- Seek out informal women leaders with community knowledge
- Develop gender-balanced teams to work with residents about short- and long-term recovery and reconstruction
- Insist on women's full representation in "community" groups and meetings
